PUBLIC NOTICE
Notice to the public is hereby given that the Southwest Clean Air Agency (SWCAA) has been provided a 400 cubic foot storage tank for use for the primary storage of oil. The tank is the property of SWCAA and is located at 173225 NE 18th Street, Vancouver, WA 98682.
A Discharge Permit (DP) has been issued approving the use of this tank for the storage and transfer of oil. The DP is valid until 12/31/2020. The DP is subject to several conditions, including the requirement that the tank be used for the storage of equipment to a well for the purpose of to marine vessels at the terminals operated by SWCAA.
The DP is located at 173225
North 18th Street, Vancouver, WA 98682.
Additional information regarding the DP may be obtained by contacting the primary contact person at 1987
State 1294, Vancouver, WA 98682.
The DP is valid through Friday, June 2, 2020.
The DP is not valid at any other terminals other than SWCAA.
Comments must be submitted to SWCAA within 10 days (10 business days) of the publication date.

— HR director Gale Baird said the company has had no positive COVID-19 cases or known exposures among its staff. But the outbreak at Firestone is a reminder that the virus will continue to circulate, she said, even when the county is able to move to new phases of reopening.

"It just shows that we can't presume that everything's going to be over just because we're in a different phase of reopening," she said. "We have to stay diligent constantly."

Evaluating workplaces
Kevin Proctor, president of corporate consulting firm ABK Consulting Group, has been working with the nonprofit group Impact Washington to conduct coronavirus workplace safety evaluations. Most companies start from the same place, he said — the manufacturing guidelines released by Gov. Jay Inslee's office May 12 — but everyone does it a little differently.

found manufacturers who have gone above and beyond," he said. On the other hand, he said, there have been manufacturers who have gotten almost everything right, but undermined their progress by missing small details, such as requiring the same towel during restroom sanitation sweeps.

Employee break rooms and kitchens tend to be a major problem area, he said, due to their often small size and shared equipment like microwave ovens and vending machines. And even if the tables are spaced apart, the employees will still be walking around the room with masks off in order to eat. Proctor said summaries of his findings are being entered up just closing their lunchrooms.

After work
Another big challenge is making sure employees follow the rules outside of work, he said, both in terms of avoiding close contact and taking their own temperatures, if the employer decides to ask them to do so.

Food manufacturers have to follow essentially the same safety rules as other manufacturers, and in theory their facilities should have a head start because workers already need some personal protective equipment such as gloves and masks, according to Craig Dixon, chief food scientist at Impact Washington.

Impact Washington's assessments have only found small mistakes so far, he said, but he noted that the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has documented reports of COVID-19 outbreaks at meat packing plants, with violations ranging from a lack of social distancing on the floor to shared housing or carpooling among workers.

In a press conference last last week, Firestone CEO Josh Hinerfeld said the company had been following recommended steps from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention since March. That was not the case, he said, as the company had been following recommended steps from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention since March. That was not the case, he said, as the company had been following recommended steps from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention since March.

Hinerfeld pointed to social distancing enforcement as one of the areas where the company struggled in the weeks leading up to the outbreak — particularly in areas outside of the plant floor.

"We could have done better," he said. "Through this process, we learned that we didn't do enough." The plant's break room didn't have enough space for staff to be 6 feet apart, he said, so the company rented a canopy and set it up with tables and chairs outside. They later put other measures in place such as removing the microwave ovens and shutting off the drinking fountain.

Asymptomatic cases were another problem, Hinerfeld said. Seventy employees had tested positive at the time of the pre-call, and Hinerfeld said 61 of them never showed any symptoms, meaning there was no way for the temperature checks to detect them.

Outbreak reported at Whatcom processor

Health official not releasing name of company for now

By DAVID RASBACH The Bellingham Herald

A Whatcom County processing facility is experiencing an active outbreak of coronavirus, the Whatcom County Health Department announced Monday. Which facility is impacted was not released and how many confirmed cases of COVID-19 have been diagnosed in the outbreak is still being determined.

"We are working very closely on that particular outbreak with the employees and the employer," Director Erika Lautenbach said during an online briefing Monday.

Lautenbach said the company has not given the health department consent to have its name released, and since it is important for the health department to be able to work with the company to investigate the outbreak, the name is not being revealed. "Obviously, it's really important for us as we're doing this investigative work to have trust in a relationship with the employer to ensure access and influence in best practices," Lautenbach said.

Lautenbach said the location of most of Whatcom's previous COVID-19 outbreaks have been able to be released because the long-term care facilities where they have occurred have been open to sharing information.

The health department reported 10 new confirmed cases in the county on Saturday and six more on Monday, bringing the county's total number of cases to 401.

The bulk of those new cases, I did not catch this morning, are associated with not only the employees of the facility, but also their close contacts," Lautenbach said. "So most of those are related to that particular outbreak that we are investigating and working with that employer."
